FACSIMILE

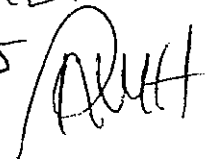

Further to my fax of 12th December and to your call at this office, I write to confirm the following:-

1. The enforceability of a restrictive covenant is tested by the successful annexure of both the benefit and the burden of the covenant to identifiable pieces of land.
2. The burden of a covenant is the obligation to comply with that covenant which in the case of title SY619052, is imposed upon you and to which you are subject. It matters not that you wish that responsibility to be imposed upon you, it is still technically a burden on your land.
3. The benefit of a covenant rests with the owner of the land for whom the benefit was originally expressed to be taken. In the case of the covenants imposed by Edmund Howard in 1959 upon your father, this would presumably have been expressed to benefit other land that Edmund Howard owned at the time of the Conveyance to Jack Temple.
4. If the benefit and the burden have not been securely annexed to different parcels of land, and if the benefit cannot be shown to accrue for the benefit of a specific piece of land, the covenant may be ineffective once the land passes beyond the original contracting parties.
5. The restrictive covenant that is successfully attached as to both benefit and burden to different pieces of land potentially can subsist indefinitely.
6. A restrictive covenant may only be enforced by the person currently owning the land to which the benefit has been attached. This will not always be apparent from Land Registry entries but the onus of proof will be on the person asserting the benefit. Third parties cannot as a general rule prevent development going ahead relying on a restrictive covenant without being able to show that they are entitled to the benefit.

I trust this gives you what you require.

Yours sincerely

Roger Smith
