the following year, the number of people who had been vaccinated against measles rose from 60% to 80%. The incidence of measles fell by 70%, and deaths from the disease dropped by 90%.

The success of the vaccination campaign was due to several factors:

- The vaccine was free of charge.
- The government provided transportation for people traveling to vaccination centers.
- The campaign was well organized and coordinated.

The results of the campaign were impressive, and it served as a model for other countries.

In conclusion, the vaccination campaign in Mexico was a success story. It demonstrated that a well-planned and coordinated effort can effectively reduce the incidence of a preventable disease.
